

Contents

Maps, Figures, and Table	xi
Introduction	1
Educated Masses and the Educative State 2/ Negotiating Integration: Local Responses to Meiji Reforms 7/ Chronological Parameters: Conceptualizing the Tokugawa-Meiji Transition 16/ Geographical Parameters: Nagano Prefecture and the Uses of Local History 19
1 Commoner Schooling in Tokugawa-Era Shinano	23
Patterns of Growth 24/ The Initial Spread of Commoner Schooling 34/ The Late Tokugawa Crisis and the Transformation of Commoner Schooling 47/ Conclusion 64
2 Village Elites and the Changing Meaning of "School" in the Late Tokugawa Period	66
From Samurai to Headman to Literatus 68/ Teaching Status: The Ozawas and Their Schools 72/ The Ozawa Family's Non- Teaching Roles 83/ "A World on Thin Ice" 90/ Conclusion 97
3 Post-Restoration Innovation and the Fundamental Code, 1868–1872	100
New Visions of Education and Schooling: The Central Government 101/ New Visions of Education and Schooling: Shinano 109/ Ending the Interregnum: The Promulgation of the Fundamental Code 130/ Conclusion 141

4	National Policy and Local Mobilization, 1872–1876	144
	The Prefectural Response to the Fundamental Code 145/ Activist Bureaucrats and Subprefectural Mobilization 161/ Early Meiji Teachers and Schools 173/ Conclusion 182
5	Local Resistance to the Fundamental Code	185
	The “Uprisings Against the New Order” 186/ Resistance in Nagano and Chikuma 195/ The Hotaka Elementary School Incident 206/ Conclusion 213
6	Negotiating “School” in Mid-Meiji Japan, 1876–1890	215
	Revising the Fundamental Code: Compromise in the Late 1870s 217/ Educational Freedom, Local Autonomy, and the Popular Rights Movement 221/ The Consolidation of the Educational System in the 1880s 232/ Conclusion 253
	Epilogue: The Local in the Nation-State	255
	Reference Matter
	Notes	267
	Works Cited	305
	Index	319